

National Center for Neighborhood and Brownfields Redevelopment – new web site

The National Center for Neighborhood and Brownfields Redevelopment, which is part of the E.J. Bloustein School of Planning and Public Policy at Rutgers University, recently launched a new web site. The objective of this new web site is to create an important national clearinghouse, or resource center, and information exchange for local governments, community organizations, and others actively involved in brownfields redevelopment, smart planning, and neighborhood revitalization issues. To date, the Center has catalogued, written abstracts on, and developed hot-links to about 400 news articles, research papers, reports, books, presentations, and other information written by government agencies, universities, economic development and other non-profit organizations, newspapers, faculty and staff at the Bloustein School, and practitioners themselves. This web site can be found at: www.policy.rutgers.edu/brownfields .